1. The first step is to identify the variables involved in the problem. In this case, the variables are the number of hours worked (H) and the number of units produced (U).

2. The second step is to determine the relationship between the variables. This can be done by plotting the data points on a graph. The x-axis represents the number of hours worked (H), and the y-axis represents the number of units produced (U).

3. The third step is to calculate the slope of the line. The slope is a measure of the rate of change of the dependent variable (U) with respect to the independent variable (H). It is calculated as follows:

4. The fourth step is to use the slope to predict the number of units produced for a given number of hours worked. For example, if the slope is 2, then for every additional hour worked, the number of units produced will increase by 2.

5. The fifth step is to check the results. This can be done by comparing the predicted values with the actual data points. If the predicted values are close to the actual values, then the model is a good fit for the data.

6. The sixth step is to use the model to make predictions. For example, if the slope is 2, then we can predict that for every additional hour worked, the number of units produced will increase by 2.

7. The seventh step is to evaluate the model. This can be done by comparing the predicted values with the actual data points. If the predicted values are close to the actual values, then the model is a good fit for the data.

8. The eighth step is to use the model to make predictions. For example, if the slope is 2, then we can predict that for every additional hour worked, the number of units produced will increase by 2.
